A report of the Minister of Public Instruction, just published, records the progress of education in France thus:—Thirty thousand teachers have opened in 23,347 cemmunes 22,980 adult evening classes for males and 1,706 for females, making a total of 24,686, in each of which, on an average, 150 hours of instruction have been given. The classes were attended by 42,697 females and 552,930 males, the majority of whom had reached an age when the experience of life had made them feel the value of instruction. The funds raised for the purpose by donations from departments, communes and private individuals have amounted to a million of france, besides which 400,000 fr. have been paid by 123,778 pupils during the four months the schools were open last winter. Yet three-fifths of those establishments are gratuitous. Four thousand of the toachers paid, from their own resources, for the warming and lighting, and also found school necessaries, even including books. This self-devotedness has not been in vain. Among the persons attending the classes 240,199 had never been taught at all or to no purpose. The progress made is shown by the fact that 62,212 have learned to read; 102,303 are also able to write and 194,102 have acquired a useful knowledge of arithmetic.
